Space pioneers hope to give a new meaning to island-hopping. A plan to launch tourists from the sand to the stars could make Hawaii the starting point for tourists traveling to space.

Planners foresee planes taking off in one place, traveling through space, then landing in another, going from the "Big Island" of Hawaii to Oahu. Within a decade, space travelers could fly from Hawaii to Japan in 45 minutes. Promoters promise a unique experience during the flight. "Flying down the Hawaii island chain, it's a completely different view of the planet than you'll see when you launch from the landlocked states," said Chuck Lauer, vice president of business development for Oklahoma City-based Rocketplane Global. "It's the blue planet view of the world."

Hawaii's tourism leaders recognize the potential for attracting visitors with the promise of space travel. However, it is unclear whether the governor can find the necessary money. The state of Hawaii is now facing serious budget problems and possible government employee layoffs.

If the plan goes ahead, tourists would pay $200,000 for a weeklong package. The package would include spaceflight training, resort accommodations and short test flights to simulate weightlessness. At the vacation's finale, five voyagers would embark on a horizontal takeoff aboard a special rocket plane, climb to 12,200 meters, coast for a few minutes of weightlessness 100 km above the Earth and then return to ground.

The process of getting a spaceport license will take about three years, meaning space flights would not start earlier than 2012. Hawaii would use existing runways on Oahu and the Big Island for its space program. Several space tourism companies have shown interest in coming to Hawaii. Studies by those businesses indicate they could turn a tidy profit if the Hawaii market opens.
